Activity 1: As you read this passage, answer the following questions.

Sheila and Daud work for an advertising firm and are partners assigned to work on a major advertising campaign. Sheila is a seasoned account manager, while Daud is a recent college graduate who was hired as a junior account executive. He is very enthusiastic and has several ideas that he shares excitedly with Sheila via email. Sheila never responds to the email. In a meeting with management to propose their ideas, however, Sheila takes the lead on presenting; as a result of her nonverbal and verbal communication, management concludes that she was responsible for the work. In fact, when commended on the ideas, she accepts the praise and makes no reference to Daud. Daud, by contrast, is afraid to say anything, and his bosses have no clue that most of the ideas are his.

1. What are the ethical considerations and dilemmas in this scenario?

The ethical considerations in this case is that Sheila claimed credit for concepts that weren't her own. She exhibited dishonesty and a lack of professional integrity by failing to recognise Daud's contributions. Sheila ought to have treated her partner equally as a senior employee and gave her the credit she deserved. Daud's motivation and faith in the job may be impacted by her unethical acts, which resulted in him not receiving the credit he was due.

2. What did Sheila communicate or not communicate during her presentation, and how?

Sheila used both her words and her body language to convey that the concepts were her own during the presentation. She presented the concepts without mentioning Daud's name, spoke with confidence, and made no reference to Daud. The idea that she was the primary contributor was further supported by her assured demeanour, tone of voice, and direct eye contact with management. She expressed exclusion and silence by failing to recognise Daud's contribution.

3. How could Daud use his verbal and nonverbal skills in the future to keep this situation from happening?

Daud may make better use of his verbal communication abilities in the future by speaking up more assuredly in meetings and outlining the thoughts he contributed in detail. Instead of being silent, he ought to voice his thoughts in a kind yet firm manner. In order to ensure that his ideas are acknowledged, he can also follow up on emails with in-person conversations. Daud can appear more interested and engaged in the team by using nonverbal cues like posture, eye contact, and gestures to convey confidence.

4. What do you believe should be the appropriate, professional response in this situation?

Daud discussing what transpired with Sheila in private would be the most suitable and professional course of action. In the future, he ought to politely express his feelings and ask that she recognise his contribution. Sheila ought to express regret and make it clear to management that they both came up with the ideas. Fairness and trust in their working relationship would be restored as a result. Daud could formally report the problem to human resources or their supervisor if it persists.

5. Do you believe the outcome of this situation would have changed if Daud had talked directly to Sheila instead of using e-mail?

Yes, if Daud had spoken with Sheila face-to-face rather than by email, the result may have been different. Direct, in-person connection facilitates quicker comprehension and feedback. It also lessens misunderstandings and fosters a closer working relationship. If Daud had addressed Sheila directly, she might have been more receptive to his ideas and more inclined to appreciate his efforts during the presentation.
